LOBBIISTS - COME ON IN!
Registered Lobbyists Met with MPs more than 1,300 Times in 10 Weeks

By: Bea Vongdouangchanh
Published November 29, 2010

Since the list of designated public office holders under the Lobbying Act was expanded 10 weeks ago to include not only Cabinet ministers, ministers’ staffs, and senior public servants, but all Parliamentarians, registered lobbyists have met with MPs and Senators more than 1,300 times. […]

Mr. Easter¹, who met with the highest number of registered lobbyists at 43 in the last two-and-a-half months, told The Hill Times last week that he meets with a lot of organizations and individuals because he feels they should be heard. […]

When the designated public office holder’s list was expanded, some government relations experts noted that there could be a chilling effect on lobbying Parliamentarians because MPs and Senators perhaps would not accept meetings with lobbyists because they wouldn’t want their meetings recorded in that manner.

Both Mr. Easter and Mr. Wallace² said being on the list now hasn’t affected their willingness to meet with registered lobbyists. […]

Regardless of who it is, however, Mr. Easter said hearing from all sides makes him a better Parliamentarian. “It would be great if there was only two sides to a story, but there’s often many sides to a story, to an issue,” he said. “Even if they’re on a different side than me, they usually have pretty good facts—yes slanted to their approach, but they’re facts that are worth considering. Then you’ve got to get the facts on [the] other side, compare the two and make a judgment call, and bring the argument forward to your caucus where possible from your own perspective,” he said.

Our system of creating laws in Canada is one of the best in the world! There is time set aside in both houses of Parliament for debate and investigation to make sure that new laws will be effective. During this time, citizens may be called upon to provide input. Parliament must agree on the exact wording and content of a bill before it receives royal assent. Members of Parliament usually introduce bills, and senators have the responsibility to give thoughtful consideration to the legislation before they approve it. This allows our government to create laws that are beneficial for our citizens.

Application Made for New Airline Policy
In 2002, three applicants approached the Canadian Transportation Agency to ask for a one-person-one-fare policy to be implemented on flights within Canada. The applicants included two people who each required an attendant for air travel, thus requiring an extra seat. The third applicant was the Council of Canadians with Disabilities, an organization composed of representatives from provincial and national organizations.

Speaker W
Private companies should not have to lose profit to comply with the one-person-one-fare policy. The Government of Canada should compensate the airlines for the money that will be lost by giving away seats on flights.

Speaker X
The airlines must obey the law and absorb the cost to make accommodations for people who need more than one seat. Citizens have rights under the Constitution that must be protected.

Speaker Y
People who require more than one seat on an airplane should pay the extra cost themselves.

Speaker Z
It will only cost Air Canada’s customers an extra $0.77 per ticket and WestJet’s customers an extra $0.44 per ticket when the one-person-one-fare policy is implemented. This is a small price to pay for the good of society.

Provincial Legislation in Québec Regarding Access to Education: Questions and Answers

Q: What is Bill 115?

A: Bill 115 (An Act following upon the court decisions on the language of instruction) was passed in 2010. This law allows children to attend English public schools if the children have attended privately funded English schools for a minimum of three years in a row and meet the criteria for individual approval required by the Québec education department.

Q: Why was Bill 115 introduced by the government of Québec in 2010?

A: Bill 115 was introduced to replace a previous law, Bill 104, which the Supreme Court of Canada, in 2009, ruled unconstitutional. This law did not comply with the Minority Language Educational Rights contained in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The ruling was suspended for one year to give the Québec government an opportunity to replace Bill 104.

Q: What was Bill 104?

A: Bill 104, entitled An Act to Amend the Charter of the French Language, imposed strict limitations on student access to English schools. These limitations were intended to prevent children who did not have the right to attend English public schools from doing so. These students had been able to transfer to the publicly funded English school system by attending a privately funded English school for as little as one year, and then claiming a history of English education. Bill 104 stopped this transfer to English schools from occurring.

Q: Why was Bill 104 introduced by the government of Québec in 2002?

A: Bill 104 was introduced to replace a previous law, Bill 101, which the Supreme Court of Canada ruled unconstitutional in 1984. Bill 101 (The Charter of the French Language) had been enacted by the Québec government in 1977 to protect and promote the French language. One of the provisions of Bill 101 required that French-speaking and immigrant parents send their children to French schools, while allowing English-speaking parents to send their children to English schools under certain conditions.

<td>As someone who speaks French, I believe that the provincial government is too lenient in allowing some students to attend English schools. We need to protect and preserve the French language!</td>
<td>As a teacher in an English school, I feel that students should be able to choose to attend either English or French schools at any time. This would be fair to both English and French speakers.</td>

Some Features of the Indian Act

- Created in 1876 by the federal government without consulting First Nations
- Defines who may be registered as a status Indian
- Originally used by the federal government to administer the treaty rights of First Nations peoples through legislation that included:
  - rules regarding band elections
  - control of reserve land
  - restrictions on travel, clothing, and participation in traditional ceremonies
- Has been amended many times and continues to be examined by both the federal government and First Nations
The magazine article from which the following excerpt was taken presents information regarding the Tsawwassen First Nation treaty, which came into effect on April 3, 2009. The treaty provides the Tsawwassen First Nation of British Columbia with $33.6 million, and with self-government funding of $2.9 million annually for the first five years of the treaty. With the exception of determining Indian status, after a transition time the Indian Act will no longer apply to Tsawwassen First Nation members, who will then be required to pay income tax and Goods and Services Tax (GST). This excerpt examines the experience of another Aboriginal group in British Columbia, the Gitxsan.

Going Out on Their Own
Are First Nations groups in B.C. ready for independence?
By Nancy MacDonald

B.C.’s Gitxsan, going a step further, are petitioning Ottawa to drop their “Indian” status altogether. They’re willing, they say, to hand over reserves, tax exemptions, free housing and, yes, the ambition of a separate order of government in return for a bigger prize: a share of resources on ancestral land. “We seek no special status or parallel society,” the coastal tribe announced in half-page ads that ran last summer in the Vancouver Sun and Globe and Mail. “We wish to live as ordinary Canadians in our own way in a multicultural society. Further, we wish to pay our own way.” This they’ll do through joint ventures in oil and gas, logging, eco-tourism and run-of-river power projects, they say. […]

None of this, of course, is coming to pass without controversy. The Gitxsan’s own membership is deeply divided. SFU’s McArthur¹, meanwhile, argues that the Gitxsan initiative should properly be seen for what it advocates: “assimilation.” And Tsawwassen’s non-Aboriginal neighbours fear its planned build-up will trigger an industrial boom, bringing more traffic, pollution, people and concrete to the […] region. The day Baird² signed the Tsawwassen treaty at the B.C. legislature, she first had to pass hundreds of Aboriginal protesters, including Stewart Phillip, grand chief of the B.C. Union of Indian Chiefs, who labelled the treaty a fraud and a sell-out; in the wider Aboriginal community, tax exemptions and claims to Aboriginal title are widely seen as non-negotiable mandates.

But change is the non-negotiable for Baird […] “Integration allows First Nations to see how other governments and corporations work,” she says, noting new seats on the boards of BC Hydro, Metro Vancouver and TransLink. That train, of course, runs in both directions; those boards, in some cases for the first time, are welcoming a First Nations partner as an equal, and getting first-hand insight into—and perhaps some good ideas from—the Aboriginal communities they now serve.

The following comments were made on June 29, 2010, by The Honourable Jason Kenney, the minister responsible for immigrants and refugees, regarding the passage of Bill C-11: The Balanced Refugee Reform Act.

We will […] be increasing the number of refugees who[m] we resettle to Canada by 20%. We will be increasing the number of resettled refugees each year by 2,500 additional refugees. This is remarkable because Canada is already receiving one out of every 10 resettled refugees in the world […]

Each year we receive about 10,000 to 12,000 resettled refugees, most of them United Nations Convention refugees. Because of the reforms that are being put into law today we will be increasing that to 14,500 resettled refugees each and every year. In addition to that […] we will be increasing the federal support for the successful integration of government assisted refugees by 20%, or $9 million, through the Refugee Assistance Program. […]

[W]e need to ensure that the system is there for people in need of protection, not people who should be coming to Canada through the ordinary immigration procedures.

Should the Canadian government change its policies regarding the granting of refugee status?

Comments

Some people live in extreme circumstances and require the security the Canadian government can offer. We have an obligation to help those who require assistance.
—Construction worker

Everyone who wants to move to Canada should go through the same screening procedures. One case should not be more important than another.
—Business owner

We should not accept people who arrive in Canada without proper identification. They could pose threats to our security.
—University professor

We must ensure that our policies regarding refugees are in keeping with existing legislation. An example of this can be seen in the Singh decision, in which the Supreme Court of Canada ruled that refugees in Canada have rights that are guaranteed by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Small Town Highlighted as Example of Canadian Immigration Benefits

October 14 2009 by Liam Clifford

Brooks, a small town in Canada, has been rejuvenated by immigration into the area

A cattle ranching town in Alberta, Canada, has become the unlikely symbol of how immigration into Canada can work to rejuvenate communities.

Brooks had long been an all-white town, filled with farmers, cowboys and their families. The town also had a strong oil and gas industry along with a large meat processing plant, and it was this that caused the recent influx of immigration into the Canadian town.

A decade ago, XL Foods Inc. Lakeside Packers started to seek foreign workers who had recently moved to Canada. The plant had found that they could not find local workers to fill the positions as they were employed at highly paid jobs within the oil and energy sector.

Now, some 60 per cent of the 2,400-strong workforce at the plant are immigrants, drastically changing the demographic of this small town and injecting new life, and of course cash, into the community.

Over time, the immigrants have settled in Canada and locals have adapted to accept the newcomers as part of the community.

Native Population ‘Natural Fit’ to Ease Alberta Worker Shortage

Renata D’Aliesio
Calgary Herald

With Help Wanted ads a staple of Alberta businesses, more and more are turning to a relatively untapped source of labour: aboriginals.

“IT is the largest untapped labour market in the country,” said Heather Douglas, president of the Calgary Chamber of Commerce. …

While aboriginals have youth and growth on their side, the community on and off reserves faces higher unemployment rates and has more high school dropouts.

Many aboriginals and businesses see Alberta’s buoyant economy¹ — and labour shortage — as an opportunity to turn these figures around. …

Facing a shortage of 100,000 workers within eight years, Brian Maynard, vice-president of the Canadian Association of Petroleum Producers, said the industry has identified aboriginals as an under-represented resource, along with foreign workers, women and people with disabilities.

“Obviously, the easiest worker to hire for our industry is someone local in the area,” Maynard said. “Many aboriginals are in Western Canada and the north,” home of the oilsands in Alberta.

Eco-entrepreneurs Launch City’s First Free Store
Drop-off Fee Helps Cover Overhead in Unique Venture

Mariam Ibrahim
Journal Staff Writer
Edmonton

There’s a new store in Edmonton that won’t have you worrying about maxing out your credit cards after an afternoon of shopping. In fact, you can leave your entire wallet, credit cards included, at home.

That’s because at Edmonton’s First Free Store, located at 8405 118th Ave., just about everything is free for the taking.

“You can take as much as you’re willing to carry out,” said 24-year-old Benjamin Ryder, who co-owns and runs the store with Brandon Tyson, 24, and Russ Armstrong, 56.

“You just walk right in and take whatever you need,” Armstrong added. “Then you are free to turn around and walk right out.”

All of the items in the store are donated by people who no longer have a use for them, the trio explains. The store, open seven days a week from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m., makes its money by charging a $2 drop-off fee for each bag or box brought in, which helps pay overhead costs. […]

“A lot of people are willing to pay that price, because they’ve come through here and taken things for free,” Tyson said. “They just want to share that experience with others.” […]

“It’s a 100-per-cent for-profit business,” Armstrong said. “We call ourselves social eco-entrepreneurs.”

In December 2008, the United States government announced a $17.4-billion loan package for General Motors and Chrysler to combat the growing economic recession. The Canadian and Ontario governments then offered a $4-billion loan package to the Canadian divisions of those companies.

The governments of both Canada and the United States provided this money in order to preserve jobs in the automobile industry to stimulate economic recovery. However, I believe the automobile industry should not receive help from the government. Companies must be self-reliant. They must also be flexible and able to adapt to changing economic circumstances if they want to continue to succeed in business.

Source II
The following statements were taken from an article on the Canadian Auto Workers’ website. The article was written by the president of the Canadian Auto Workers union in response to the loan packages announced by the governments of Canada and the United States.

This challenge before us is not just about saving the auto industry. This is about our overall economy, and our future as a trading nation. …

We’d go from recession to depression overnight. So this isn’t just about auto. And it isn’t a bailout, either. After all, these are commercial loans, not hand-outs. Bridge financing from the government’s own banking institutions … Not from taxpayers’ pockets.

We all have a stake in keeping this industry going in Canada. We’re all counting on the jobs, the exports, the taxes that are generated by this industry. It’s not a bail-out, it’s an investment.

Planned obsolescence is the practice of manufacturing products that are designed to become obsolete (out of date or useless) before they actually require replacement. This is done by ending the supply of a good or service and marketing a newer version. The goal is to encourage consumers to purchase each newer version of the product, creating an increase in demand for the product. The practice of planned obsolescence has advantages and disadvantages for both producers and consumers.

Some advantages of planned obsolescence

For producers
- increased wealth from sales
- advancements in technology

For consumers
- wide variety of products available
- feeling of buying newer, safer, or better products

Some disadvantages of planned obsolescence

For producers
- inefficient use of limited resources
- costs of research and development

For consumers
- pressure from marketing campaigns
- cost and inconvenience of replacing products

The Average Consumer: Target of Planned Obsolescence

By Diane Crow  Monday, May 11, 2009

Originally cars were manufactured in the twenties. The cars from before WWII\(^1\) were still driven in the streets of London in the Sixties, during this time Volkswagen also built a cheap, durable car until it flooded the entire market. If a person was able to afford a Rolls Royce then it was considered the best buy in the world with a large re-sale value. Unfortunately, executives realized that once sales stabilized people would no longer be willing or would need to buy a new car. It would have meant millions of workers laid off and a considerable drop in profits. For the next two or three decades, the ultimate purpose in the automotive industry would be to produce cars, but to keep workers and manufacturers busy making cars, with the only real result being that tons of steel and billions of hours of work were spent to produce cars not meant to last for very long. The whole point of this was (and still is) to keep the customer coming back even before the previous obligations toward payment and maintenance of their currently owned car ended.

Even Day Labourers are Protected by Law
Employer on Hook for Workers Compensation if Employee is Injured on the Job

Howard Levitt
Financial Post

In a gas station restaurant, in a Toronto area strip mall, Jack holds court each day. He controls a group of men. The men do not have names. They do not have social insurance numbers. They do not have identities. Yet they have two things in common — they are men and they are able-bodied.

These men have other lives — they are police, firefighters, postal workers and more. But on their days off, they approach Jack looking for additional work.

There is something else these men have in common. They do not want the income from the jobs Jack secures for them to be reported to anyone …

Each day, Jack gets calls from a variety of employers looking for labourers. The jobs usually are strenuous and the employees are not covered by workers compensation. They don’t “officially” exist and are paid in cash.

If they become injured on the job, they invariably have an “accident.” first thing the next day at their official job and it is the legal employer whose premium is raised and is rendered less competitive as a result.

It isn’t easy for legitimate employers to compete for customers with Jack’s clients. The legitimate employers generally pay higher wages and benefits which Jack’s employers do not. …

But how protected are these employers in this hidden economy? They think they have an economic advantage — no statutory remittances¹, no Employment Insurance, Canada Pension Plan payments, vacation pay, overtime, or other benefits. Not even wrongful dismissal damages. But they are wrong.

If one of these people is injured, and seeks Workers Compensation benefits, the employer effectively becomes the insurer for that employee. Their explanation that the employee is not on the payroll will be of no help.
