Senate Defeats Bill C-311

Bill C-311, the Climate Change Accountability Act, was a private member’s bill that was introduced by a member of an opposition party in the House of Commons. The bill—which required that the Canadian government set stricter targets for the reduction of greenhouse gas emissions and monitor the achievement of those targets—was passed by a majority vote of opposition parties in the House of Commons. Today, the Senate defeated Bill C-311.
Source III

Opposition members in the House of Commons believe that Bill C-311 would have been a positive step in protecting the environment. We are frustrated that it was voted down by the Senate.

Because the Conservative Party of Canada formed a minority government in the House of Commons, opposition parties were able to pass Bill C-311. However, in the Senate, a majority of senators who were members of the Conservative Party of Canada voted against Bill C-311. The passage of the bill into law was stopped because the Senate has the power to determine which laws are passed.

The Senate should not be able to prevent the passage of a bill such as Bill C-311 that has been passed by the House of Commons. The Senate should be abolished because senators are not accountable to the Canadian public.

The Senate is effective in providing “sober second thought” regarding decisions made by members of Parliament. If senators believed that Bill C-311 set targets that were not in the best interests of Canadians, they were correct in voting against the bill.

As a member of Parliament, I have several roles. Most importantly, my job is to represent the constituents who elected me. I maintain a constituency office in my riding as well as an office in Ottawa, where I represent my constituents and assist them in accessing government services. While Parliament is in session, I debate and vote on bills. Also, I have an obligation to support the policies of my political party.
Elected Representatives and Political Party Membership

Members of Parliament (MPs) should vote on legislation according to party position.

- Platforms clarify the positions of political parties on issues.
- Unified voting allows for the enactment of legislation with less time spent in debate.
- Party members follow party platforms.
- In order for a ruling party to stay in power, it must have the confidence and support of its MPs.

Members of Parliament (MPs) should vote on legislation according to constituents’ wishes.

- Voters who are informed about issues elect the best candidate.
- Elected representatives give constituents a voice in the legislative process.
- The priorities of individual ridings may conflict with those of a political party.
- When voting on legislation, individual MPs may be influenced by lobbyists.

Some Viewpoints on the Youth Criminal Justice Act

Youth offender
I made a big mistake and painted graffiti on a store owner’s property. Because it was the first time that I had gotten into trouble with the law, I had to complete community service hours and go to counselling instead of going to court. I take full responsibility for my actions and I am glad that I don’t have a criminal record.

Police officer
When I apprehended a youth spray painting the side of the store, I took the offender to the police station and called the youth’s parents. Although there were charges brought against the offender, I agreed with the prosecutor that, in this case, the youth should not have to go to court.

Store owner
This is not the first time my store has been vandalized with graffiti. I do not think the offender received an appropriate punishment. He should have had to go to court. I think that the Youth Criminal Justice Act focuses too much on the offender and not enough on the victims of crime.

Community resident
I am not satisfied with the treatment that youth receive in the justice system. Young people should be accountable for their actions and should be treated in the same way as adults. I do not feel safe in my own community knowing that some accused youth do not even have to go to court.
Survey Results Regarding Youth Sentencing Principles

- Youth offenders should be held less accountable than adults because of their reduced maturity.
- Putting youth in jail is an effective method of correcting behaviour.
- The youth’s circumstances should be taken into consideration at sentencing.
- Protecting society from crime should be the focus of the youth justice system.
- Rehabilitation is an important goal of the youth justice system.

The History of the Court Challenges Program of Canada

- 1978: The Court Challenges Program is created by the Liberal government to provide funding for court cases involving rights guaranteed by the Constitution Act of 1867 to individuals who are members of official-language minorities.
- 1982: The Court Challenges Program is expanded to respect language-rights provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.
- 1985: The Court Challenges Program is expanded to respect equality-rights provisions of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.
- 1992: The Court Challenges Program is cancelled by the Conservative government.
- 1994: The Court Challenges Program is reinstated by the Liberal government.
- 2006: The Court Challenges Program is cancelled by the Conservative government.
- 2008: The Court Challenges Program is replaced by the Program to Support Linguistic Rights under the Conservative government.

Source II

The Court Challenges Program has provided people with the opportunity to have their concerns addressed at a hearing. Taxpayer dollars are used to pay the costs of the hearing. Why should the government pay the court costs for people who take action against the government and, at the same time, bear the costs of defending itself? This makes no sense to me.
Some Successful Court Challenges Program Cases

Case W
Corbiere et al. v. The Queen and Batchewana Indian Band (1999)

Non-resident band members had had no say in the selection of the band council; however, the band council represented them in land claims and treaty negotiations. The Supreme Court of Canada ruled that the Indian Act residency requirement violated the rights of Aboriginal band members living off reserve.

Case X

Mr. Beaulac was convicted of murder in a trial conducted in English. The judge at the trial found that Mr. Beaulac’s skills in English were adequate, though not perfect, and denied his right to have the case conducted in French. Mr. Beaulac appealed his conviction based on the argument that he should be allowed to be heard in court in either of the official languages of Canada. The Supreme Court of Canada ruled that the appeal should be allowed. A new trial, to be held before a judge and jury who spoke both official languages, was ordered.

Case Y
Lalonde et al. v. Ontario
(Commission de restructuration des services de santé) (2001)

The Ontario government decided to close the only fully Francophone hospital in the Ottawa region. Several organizations appealed the decision, and the Ontario Court of Appeal agreed that the hospital should remain open and that closing it would violate the unwritten principle of protection for minorities. The hospital was considered important to the survival of the minority Francophone community in Ontario.

Case Z

Mr. Wu was convicted of an offence and was subject to a mandatory minimum fine. The trial judge provided no time to pay and ordered that Mr. Wu serve a conditional sentence of 75 days. The Supreme Court of Canada decided that those living in poverty should not face any form of imprisonment based on their inability to pay a fine.

The Indian Act was amended with the passage of Bill C-3 on December 9, 2010. Bill C-3 grants eligibility for Indian status to children and grandchildren of First Nations women who lost their status because they married non-Aboriginal men.
Suit Claims Grandchildren of Women Who Lost Indian Status are Owed $2.7 Billion

Jennifer Graham
The Canadian Press
Regina

For years, Heather Loch says she has felt left out, unable to join her family as a status Indian or receive the same advantages and benefits.

Status Indians don’t have to pay taxes while employed on a First Nation. They get financial assistance for post-secondary school and extended health benefits.

But Loch is among some 45,000 grandchildren in Canada who don’t have status because their First Nations grandmothers married non-native men. […]

Loch and her sister, Charmaine, are named as plaintiffs in a lawsuit filed Wednesday seeking compensation for their situation.

Up until 1985, First Nations women who married non-natives were stripped of their status. That was corrected with changes to the Indian Act, but another inequity remained. While women who regained status could pass it to their children, their children couldn’t transmit it to their children if they married non-native men. Men kept the status no matter whom they married.

After years of arguing the law was discriminatory, legislation was introduced last year to extend Indian status to the grandchildren of aboriginal women who married non-natives. The bill received royal assent in December.

But the statement of claim, which has yet to be proven in court, alleges the law doesn’t address the harm the grandchildren suffered. […]

The suit alleges that if the plaintiffs’ status had been recognized, they would [have] been entitled to receive funding assistance for post-secondary studies. […]

Merchant[^1], who is trying to get the suit certified as a class action[^2], alleges the grandchildren of the aboriginal women who lost status are owed more than $2.7 billion in taxes and other funds.

He said being denied status affected their lives “in a profound and permanent way.”

“For many of them it was also very impactful socially because they were really First Nations in their hearts […] but they were excluded from being a status Indian by the way the law functions. So they didn’t have a vote in band council elections, so they didn’t get certain kinds of benefits or get certain kinds of inclusions, so it cost them money, it changed their lives and it changed things socially,” said Merchant.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

Feedback on the ‘Parent and Grandparent Super Visa’

Allowing seniors to immigrate to Canada doesn’t make financial sense. They often don’t work, so they’re not contributing to the tax base. They do access our medical system when they become ill, though, and receive pensions to which they haven’t contributed. The super visa is a good solution because it lets families be together and places monetary responsibility on the families rather than the government.

—Citizen W

I came to Canada as a political refugee, and I desperately want to bring my parents to join the rest of the family here. They are poor, though, and I am just getting established in Canada. If they can’t immigrate and must get a super visa, I don’t think that we make enough money to pay for airfare and long-term health insurance, as well as to provide a guarantee that I can support them entirely while they are in Canada.

—Citizen Y

We’ve been trying for years to get my mother into Canada. She is an excellent grandmother and we want our children to know their family and culture. She will also help take care of our children and household. We would rather Mother be allowed to move here permanently, but we are pleased that the super visa gets her into the country on a long-term basis.

—Citizen X

Families that have immigrated to Canada benefit when their grandparents arrive; they often feel more comfortable in their lives in Canada with additional family support, not to mention the financial security of having another adult in the household. Parents or grandparents immigrating to Canada bring with them their life savings, which may include considerable wealth, and could provide opportunities for their family members and for Canada. The super visa allows grandparents into Canada, but it does not go far enough to benefit families and all Canadians.

Critics Call Québec Demand on New Immigrants Cynical Political Stunt

Newcomers Will Have to Declare Commitment to Province’s French Values

Montreal Gazette
Montréal

A Québec government plan to force new immigrants to sign a declaration saying they will respect Québec’s common values is a political stunt designed to increase the government’s support prior to a provincial election, opponents of the new plan said Wednesday.

“It is a political move to gain votes, and I hope that most Quebeckers see through this,” said Ehab Lotayef, the vice-president of Parole Arabe, an Arab community organization. “I don’t know what it can achieve. I am all for new immigrants learning more about the place they are coming to, but this is a place that already has a Charter of Rights.”

Starting in January, immigrants applying to come to Québec will be required, as part of their application process, to sign a declaration promising to learn French and acknowledging that they understand that men and women have equal rights and political and religious powers are separate.

The declaration will be translated into several languages so that immigrants understand what they are reading, but they must sign the French version.

Anyone who refuses to sign the declaration will not have their application accepted. Québec Immigration Minister Yolande James said Wednesday after unveiling a series of measures designed to help immigrants better integrate into Québec society.

“Coming to Québec is not a right, it is a privilege,” James said. “If you refuse to sign the declaration, you won’t be able to come here.”

Main Street Coffee Shop Courts Mob

By Jeremy Shepherd, contributing writer

They target an environmentally friendly business, plan the right day to strike and buy stuff.

Originating in San Francisco in 2008, Carrotmobsm are designed as a reverse boycott, encouraging consumers to patronizestores attempting to reduce their ecological footprint.

Omar Mutashar, the founder of the Vancouver branch of Carrotmob, hopes the first swarming of a local store May 16 will attract at least 200 extra customers to Salt Spring Coffee on Main Street. The Carrotmobbers plan to patronize the store near Main and 27th Avenue between 11 a.m. to 2 p.m.

Mutashar said his group interviewed several coffee shops on Main Street about the idea. Following the interviews, video clips from the most intriguing eight coffee shops were posted online, leaving the final judgment at the fingertips of voters.

Salt Spring Coffee, which pledged 110 per cent of the day’s profits to make its store’s lighting more efficient, was the winner. “They really showed they wanted to make their stores environmentally friendly,” said Mutashar. […]

“All you have to do is just buy coffee,” stated Mutashar, who said the simplicity of the Carrotmob was part of its appeal.

Emily Jubenville, one of the organizers of the event, said the concept was a great way to remind customers about the power of their wallets.

“I think the Carrotmob is a really great way to hand power back to the consumer,” she said in an email.

The newspaper article from which this excerpt was taken presents information regarding the potential loss of caribou populations in Alberta. Three First Nations are taking the Canadian government to court in an effort to restrict industrial development where caribou are threatened.

First Nations Press Ottawa Over Caribou Depletion
Native Groups Seek Recovery Strategy in Court

Elise Stolte
Journal Staff Writer
Edmonton

Using the federal Species at Risk Act, the First Nations hope to force Ottawa to step into what’s normally provincial jurisdiction and limit industry access to caribou habitat. […]

Two caribou herds live in the area the Beaver Lake Cree claim as their traditional territory, an area the size of Switzerland bordering Saskatchewan in the centre of the province.

Lawyers expect to call University of Alberta biologist Stan Boutin as an expert witness. In a study published July 5, he found the size of each herd has fallen dramatically in the past 14 years and now just 175 to 275 animals remain.

If trends continue, he said, the number of caribou per herd will fall below 50 by 2030 and below 10 by 2046, which is too small to survive long. His report blames industrial activity for the decline because new roads, pipelines and seismic lines make the area less hospitable to caribou and encourage the free movement of predators, such as wolves.

Two environmental groups, the Pembina Institute and the Alberta Wilderness Association, also filed a parallel lawsuit in support of the First Nations on Wednesday. […]

Simon Dyer, oilsands director for the Pembina Institute, said the lawsuit was a last resort because governments had been “dragging their heels for decades.”

But Alberta Sustainable Resources Minister Mel Knight disagreed, pointing to ongoing land-use planning for the lower Athabasca region. A 17-member panel released recommendations for conservation under that plan two weeks ago, saying up to 32 per cent of the area should be protected from development.

“We’ve got a very good plan in place in the province, working, moving, going forward and continuing to see some success,” he said.
